"From an insurance standpoint, there are some important distinctions between remote work, working from home and telecommuting," explains Les Masterson, managing editor for Insure.com. "Insurance needs can differ based on where an individual's 'permanent office' is based."

Insurance considerations for remote workers include:

Auto insurance. Less driving can mean eligibility for rebates of 15 to 20% off existing premiums. Pay-per-mile plans may be a good option for those no longer driving frequently, but these plans often come with onboard diagnostics. Another option is to pursue a low mileage or other car insurance discount.

Home insurance. When personal and work property commingle, insurance responsibility can be confusing. Coverage for equipment damage or injury can be dictated by an employee's status, with different determinations for those who are self-employed and others who telecommute.

Health insurance. During this pandemic, there have been many health benefits to working remotely. Experts suggest evaluating needs related to eye strain and mental health.

Life insurance. Work location on its own is unlikely to require a review of life insurance coverage, but changes in family finances during the pandemic may make this a good time to review policy amounts. A life insurance calculator can help consumers determine their ideal coverage level and cost.

Employees whose work situation has changed during the past year, for any reason, are encouraged to assess their insurance protections and be sure their coverage is appropriate for their current needs.

Les Masterson is available to elaborate on how insurance can be fine-tuned for remote workers.
