"It's not that vacations are planned around the use of credit cards, but credit cards are often used to pay for them," explains Brooklyn Lowery, editorial director for CardRatings. "Vacations don't come cheap, and leveraging the benefits of credit cards may be a way to help pay for a trip, or parts of it, or even save a little money along the way."

As consumers continue to weather the financial environment of the pandemic, credit cards can lend a hand in financial planning if used correctly, and that includes using them for travel.

Consistent credit card users may have already earned the necessary points to help book a trip, with airline miles and free hotel stays shining up the package. Rewards cards, adds Lowery, can be a cardholder's "best friend."

"Three points per dollar spent at the gas pump, for instance, can really add up during a cross-country road trip," she says. "So could four points per dollar on flights. It pays to be smart and compare and contrast the strengths and weaknesses of the many credit card options that permeate the landscape."

Pro Tip: Using credit cards on vacation is also a safer option than cash, or even debit cards, experts assess. Security options offered by many credit companies are top-notch, with purchases more secure due to consumer protection laws that are particularly better for credit cards. Additionally, using a credit card while traveling or on vacation can earn much needed rewards points to fund the next vacation or even help you save money with perks like included rental vehicle or trip insurance.

Lowery is available for comment and can expand on the importance of understanding how to utilize credit cards in the most advantageous way. Lowery is the resident credit card expert and analyst for CardRatings and specializes in helping everyday credit card users get the most out of their rewards.
